sued by the French Minister of War this afternoon.

By its development and the nature of the ground over which the battle will be waged, the communication says, this vast engagement will differ profoundly from the battles of other times.

By reason of the abandonment of the attack which the Germans planned against Nancy," says the communication, "our concentration has been carried out with regularity and in its entirety and thus the whole of the French army will battle with the whole of the German forces, with the exception of those German troops concentrated on the eastern frontier of the empire.

"The violation of the neutrality of Belgium has extended the Belgians and French lines to the frontier of Holland. The next battle, therefore, will be from Basle to Maastricht, with several millions of men on each side.

"It is this enormous extension of effective and of front which will characterize the battle and it will be profoundly different from all other battles.

"When the adversaries engage in battle along a front of from twenty to thirty kilometers (13 to 20 miles) the engagement is characterized by two features—it is rapid and immediately decisive. With a front extending over 400 kilometers (226 miles) it is not likely to be the same.

"It would appear impossible, from all evidence, that one of the adversaries would be able to gain decisive advantage upon this front of 400 kilometers. The operations along so great a line would have varying fortune. We will have an advantage at one or several points; the Germans will have an advantage at other points and the line of battle will continue to be modified until one of the adversaries succeeds by coordination of movement and mass of effort in gaining some point, the superiority of which will dislodge the adverse front and mark the end of the first battle.

"These observations have for their object the preparation of the public for a battle in new form and without precedent in history."

NEW HIGH ALTAR

that epochal day of the eighth century, to show the heathen how powerless were the gods whom they worshipped, Boniface, the patron Saint of Germany felled with his axe the giant oak sacred to the Thunder-god, Thor. Astonished that no riven thunder bolt from the god, Thor, blasted Boniface from the earth, the idolaters at once awakened to the folly of polytheism to embrace the saving truths of Christianity. On the countenance of Boniface sits the glow of Apostolic zeal for the faith mingled with defiance for the thunders of the false god, as he points to the work of his destructive axe, the prostrate oak, whilst around him are grouped his confiding followers and somewhat removed are the dismayed heathens, their aspect being one of terror with disappointment predominate. In this picture there are twenty figures naturally grouped, tense in action and emotion, Teutonic in feature and environment. The fall of the mighty oak beautifully typifies the fall of Heathendom in Germany and the triumph of Christianity planted by Boniface, the Apostle of the Vaterland. With the surrounding verdure of the Germanic forests, its glimpses of azure sky, its strong Teutonic impress in feature, dress and action, one cannot view the scene without concluding that the maker of this picture is not alone an artist above the ordinary but is also a faithful researcher in antique detail. The synchronization is perfect. Though ancient is the legend of St. Boniface and the oak, yet in his grouping, in his portrayal of action, and in his entire method of treatment, the artist is strikingly original.

Turning to the west window of the transept, we face a scene so remote in locality, so varied in the peoples depicted, that we are reminded not fairly of the universality of the Church Catholic. This picture has to do not with the Teutonic but with the Celtic race. As we gaze on the picture, with Patrick, we press the soil of ancient Erin in the early centuries. Before us looms that heroic scene in the Hall at Tara, on that noted Easter morn, when Patrick is hailed before the King for violating the royal prohibition that no fire should be kindled before the King's. Patrick, observing the ceremonial of his Church had struck the flint for the Easter fire, and before he stands to answer the charge of disobedience to the King. To the King and his Court the sainted Patrick tells of that Heavenly King and of his Church, all of which by his listeners is grasped with eagerness, but the doctrine of the Trinity being unable to comprehend, they hesitate to accept. The reasonableness of that doctrine he elucidates by the trefail, the Shamrock. Erect stands Patrick, a look of inspired eloquence in that patriarchal face. Points with one hand to the Shamrock which aloft he holds in the other. The deep pensiveness of the King, the light that gleams in the eyes of his fair daughter, the meditative atmosphere of the entire grouping, graphically bring out the new religious awakening that came to them and Ireland through the divine eloquence and indisputable logic of St. Patrick, Ireland's patron Saint. Across the distant glen, through the impenetrable window of the Hall of Tara a breeze is dened with the verdure of the heather and the Shamrock seem to fan the cheek of the beholder, so real stand the picture before him. Around the blazing fagots, in the workmanship of the tripod with its fragrant incense and in the craft of the regal jewel case in the capitals and in the architecture of the Hall, in every detail, the spirit of the Celt hovers impressing on the whole the stamp of the national Celtic genius. It is a scene that gladdens the heart of him who cherishes the ancient traditions of the land of his birth or extraction, and holds the eye of the artistically appreciative, from whatever land he hails, for the picture speaks a universal language since it is a work of exalted art.

That same harmony with the architecture of the Church edifice which is to be found in the altars marks also the ornamental designs of these windows. The soft mosaics with opalescent effects commingling with the delightful harmonic hues are poems in color fit settings for the pictorial epics so nobly treated. These windows are works for study, not for hasty inspection, if they would be appreciated. The artist, Mr. John Alberts, Art Glass Manufacturer of Louisville, Ky., trained in the best studios of Munich whence but a few weeks since he has returned has in his line but few equals and no superiors. The huge transept windows and the others throughout the Church are valued at $12,000 and unlike the altars which were individual gifts, the donors declining to give their names were paid for by the Congregation which has withheld no money for the beautification of this House of the Lord from their beloved pastor, Father P. M. Jones. Indeed, his has been the plan, the progress, the construction, the execution of the Church edifice and of every detail thereof from foundation to minaret, including altars, statuary, frescoes and windows. The richness of his designs, the delicacy of his artistic taste stamps the minutest detail in the Church edifice and in every window picture, and has made it what it is, a fitting habitation of the Sacramental Lord to whose sacred presence all else therein is subordinated—a treasure house of genuine art.
